Tonga Island History

The Tonga Islands lie in the South Seas, about three thousand miles southwest of Honolulu. They are sometimes called the Friendly Islands because of the happy carefree ways of the people. Tonga is an independent kingdom, ruled by a king who traces his ancestry back through generations of Tongan Kings. The first Europeans to reach the Tonga Islands arrived in 1616 and Captain James Cook explored Tonga in 1773 and 1777. There are about 160 islands in all, with a total area of about 269 square miles. The three main groups are Tongatapu, Haapai and Vavau. Most of the islands are made up of raised coral limestone, and were built up by volcanoes, some of which are still active. To the west of Tonga a line of volcanic craters rises from the sea.

S.S. Forester

Many of the ship's relics (the masts, yardarms, hardware) in the Tonga are from the S.S. Forester, a four-masted lumber schooner, which sailed the South Seas from 1900 to 1932. Built by Hay and Wright of Alameda, California, the FORESTER carried redwood and Douglas fir to lumber markets in the Pacific and Indian Oceans and returned to San Francisco with copra, shell, hardwood and other island products. Her original skipper, Captain Otto Daeweritz took command at the age of 36, and died aboard the FORESTER at the age of 83 in 1947 when the ship was beached on the Martinez tidelands.
